The challenges facing the hotel sector: a cross-country perspective

Hotel Inclusive Recruitment Education (H.I.R.E) is an innovative project (2024-1-PL01-KA220-VET-000253671) aimed at tackling employment challenges in the hospitality sector. As part of the project's initial research phase, in-depth interviews were conducted with 22 hotel managers across three partner countries: Poland (5), Greece (7), and Cyprus (10). The interviews, conducted between November and December 2024, followed a standardized format and were analyzed using advanced AI tools to ensure thorough data interpretation.
The research findings from Poland, Greece, and Cyprus show significant commonalities in employment challenges within the hotel industry while also highlighting distinct regional characteristics. All three countries experience considerable difficulties in recruiting and retaining qualified staff, although their specific circumstances differ based on location and market demands.

In Poland, hotels mainly operate in urban areas, with respondents primarily representing city-based establishments. The Polish market faces a significant shortage of vocational education and practical training programs. Hotels usually maintain a core staff of 40 to 50 permanent employees, adding seasonal workers as necessary. The Polish industry particularly highlights the significance of professional qualifications and formal training.

The Greek market demonstrates greater flexibility in employment practices, often implementing innovative solutions such as trial periods for potential employees. Greek hoteliers show particular interest in cultural sensitivity and guest service quality, with a strong focus on maintaining high standards despite seasonal staffing fluctuations.

Cyprus presents a distinct profile with its heavy reliance on international tourism. Cypriot hotels employ more seasonal workers (approximately 66% seasonal versus 33% permanent staff) than their Polish and Greek counterparts. The Cypriot market has developed more structured approaches to training and development, particularly through the Human Resource Development Authority (HRDA), which provides subsidized training programs.

The hospitality industry has long faced challenges in maintaining a stable and engaged workforce. Industry statistics highlight the severity of the problem. For example, turnover rates in the hotel sector, which were around 45% in pre-pandemic years, have surged to levels of 60-70% in some markets, as reported by the American Hotel & Lodging Association (2023). This increase complicates recruitment efforts, raises training costs, and makes it harder for hotels to uphold high service quality. Moreover, demographic changes, such as aging populations in regions like Europe and a growing preference for flexible work arrangements, further hinder the ability to secure qualified and reliable employees.

Among the labor pools that remain underutilized are individuals aged 50+ and persons with disability, such as those who are Deaf or hard of hearing. Although these groups have encountered barriers to entering the workforce, they represent significant potential for addressing the labor challenges in the hotel industry. Developing inclusive practices is not only an ethical imperative it also presents a valuable opportunity for hoteliers to fill critical labor gaps, enhance organizational outcomes, and attract a broader range of customers.

The case for targeting employees aged 50+

Older employees have increasingly been recognized as a valuable yet underappreciated demographic in the labor market. In Europe, for instance, approximately 27% of hospitality workers are over the age of 50, as highlighted by Eurostat data (2023). This group often remains overlooked due to universal stereotypes about adaptability and physical capability, even though research suggests that individuals in this age bring significant strengths to the workforce. Workers aged 50 and older are often characterized by their reliability, dedication, and life experience, making them well-suited for challenging roles that require attention to detail and customer engagement. Furthermore, studies indicate that this demographic exhibits lower turnover rates than younger workers, thereby reducing the ongoing costs associated with recruitment and replacement.

The potential for hiring 50+ workers is particularly important in addressing the industry's struggles with filling seasonal or part-time roles. Older individuals seeking flexible employment can help meet fluctuating labor demands without compromising service quality. However, hotels need to design targeted strategies to appeal to this demographic. Offering short-term, practical training programs tailored to those with no prior experience is a key first step. These programs can focus on the basics of customer relations, housekeeping standards, or digital tools used in hospitality services. Additionally, flexible work options, such as part-time schedules, can attract individuals balancing work with other life commitments or retirement.

Harnessing the potential of
Deaf and hard-of-hearing employees

Another often-overlooked talent pool in the hospitality workforce is individuals who are Deaf or hard of hearing, a group that continues to face significant barriers in accessing employment opportunities. Misconceptions about the capabilities of these individuals have contributed to their exclusion, despite clear evidence that they can bring valuable skills and unique perspectives to workplace settings, particularly in customer-facing industries like hospitality.

Deaf and hard-of-hearing employees demonstrate strong problem-solving skills, heightened attention to detail, and an ability to foster mutual respect and collaboration within teams. With the implementation of appropriate accommodations and communication tools, these employees can thrive in various roles, from housekeeping and front-desk operations to administrative work. Hoteliers adopting inclusive hiring practices can further enhance their organization's reputation by signaling a commitment to diversity, equity, and inclusion, a factor that resonates deeply with socially conscious customers in today's market.

To successfully integrate Deaf and hard-of-hearing employees, hotels must address workplace accessibility and adapt their communication strategies. This includes leveraging technologies such as visual communication tools, on-screen alerts, and captioning for training videos. Additionally, offering sign language interpretation for training sessions or team meetings fosters inclusivity and helps create a supportive environment. Sensitivity training for existing staff is equally important, ensuring that all employees understand how to effectively collaborate with their deaf colleagues while promoting mutual respect.

Several leading examples highlight how the integration of deaf and hard-of-hearing workers can benefit the hospitality industry. For instance, a few hotel chains around the world have partnered with NGOs or vocational schools specializing in the employment of differently-abled individuals to create focused hiring pipelines. Designing recruitment strategies that specifically target this group, such as hosting job fairs tailored to differently-abled communities, has proven effective in identifying talented individuals who can bring long-term value to their organizations.

The importance of inclusivity in workforce strategy

Beyond addressing labor shortages, inclusive hiring practices have demonstrated broader organizational benefits that hoteliers cannot afford to overlook. Reports from Deloitte (2020) and McKinsey & Company (2022) emphasize how diverse and inclusive teams contribute to operational performance improvements within the workforce. For example, companies prioritizing inclusive hiring practices have been shown to experience 25% higher profitability than less-diverse competitors. Additionally, inclusive workplaces report lower turnover and heightened employee engagement, reducing overall employment costs while improving service quality.

Diversity among employees also enhances innovation and adaptability. A workforce that represents a wide range of perspectives is better able to solve complex problems, anticipate diverse customer needs, and devise creative solutions. For hotels, which depend on customer satisfaction to build loyalty and revenue, gaining these advantages is critical. Not only does an inclusive workforce foster a more dynamic workplace, but it also helps hotels appeal to an increasingly diverse clientele, many of whom value businesses that reflect their own values of equity and representation.

Practical strategies
for promoting inclusivity

Tailoring job descriptions and recruitment practices

To effectively target underrepresented labor groups such as workers aged 50+ and the Deaf/hard of hearing, hoteliers need to design job descriptions that explicitly outline flexibility, training opportunities, and workplace accommodations. Removing unnecessary barriers, such as prior experience requirements, can also expand the candidate pool.

Providing accessible training programs

Tailored training and onboarding programs are essential for engaging these groups. For instance, older workers without prior hospitality experience may benefit from condensed modules focusing on customer service basics, safety protocols, and job-specific tasks. For deaf workers, incorporating visual aids, captions, and sign-language interpreters into training materials is essential for ensuring equal access to skill development. Additionally, offering multilingual or culturally adaptive materials for international staff can support broader diversity efforts.

Building a supportive work environment

Inclusivity cannot thrive without a supportive workplace culture. To this end, hoteliers should prioritize launching awareness programs that educate staff on the importance of diversity and equip teams with the skills to collaborate effectively. Assigning peer mentors to employees from underrepresented groups can also foster a sense of belonging, while periodic feedback sessions can help identify areas for improvement.

Enhancing accessibility

Hotels must invest in workplace infrastructure that accommodates the needs of deaf and hard-of-hearing employees. This may include installing visual alerts in high-traffic areas, equipping meeting rooms with speech-to-text technology, or fine-tuning workplace layouts to ensure accessibility. Making these adaptations signals a long-term commitment to inclusivity and improves workplace convenience for all employees.

Leveraging partnerships

Hoteliers should collaborate with vocational schools, government-funded programs, and nonprofit organizations to create recruitment pipelines for older workers or individuals with disability. Publicizing these partnerships can help enhance the hotel's reputation while attracting socially conscious customers and business clients.

Industry leadership through inclusivity

Hoteliers who integrate inclusive hiring practices into their workforce strategies position themselves as leaders in addressing some of the industry's most pressing challenges. Efforts to recruit and retain workers aged 50+ and those who are Deaf or hard of hearing are not merely acts of social responsibility; they are strategic moves toward building resilient organizations that can thrive in today's competitive market. By extending employment opportunities to underrepresented groups, the hospitality industry can create win-win scenarios that benefit businesses, employees, and customers alike.
The strategic adoption of inclusive practices represents an opportunity for hoteliers to tackle critical labor shortages while driving innovation, adaptability, and service excellence. As the industry continues to evolve, prioritizing workforce diversity and inclusivity will contribute not only to its sustainable growth but also to a broader social impact. By actively addressing demographic and structural challenges, the hotel industry can foster workplaces that are both equitable and competitive, ensuring its continued relevance in a rapidly changing world. Hoteliers who embrace this approach will be better positioned to meet workforce demands and deliver exceptional guest experiences while reinforcing their broader commitment to equity and inclusion.

Aged 50+ without experience as a valuable employee

Who is a 50+ candidate without experience in hospitality?

A 50+ candidate without experience in the hospitality industry is often someone at the threshold of a new professional stage, seeking not so much a career as a safe, meaningful place of employment. In most cases, this is not someone who has actively built a path in the service sector but rather someone who has worked in other professions (often manual labor), managed a household, supported a family, and now, facing a changing life situation, decides to return to the job market or change professions.
These individuals may not have a "hospitality-ready" resume but possess years of life experience that have shaped invaluable traits for working with people: composure, patience, empathy, consistency, and a sense of responsibility. In interviews conducted with hospitality managers, it was repeatedly mentioned that these individuals are "loyal," "don't complain," "work steadily," "don't create drama," and "can be relied upon."

It's important to emphasize that 50+ individuals entering the hospitality industry do not expect spectacular promotions. They are often not interested in managerial positions and do not have high financial expectations. What matters to them is being needed, having contact with people, feeling part of a team, and influencing the daily functioning of the workplace. Their approach is dominated by gratitude for the opportunity and motivation to prove they are trustworthy—which translates into diligence and a high work ethic.

Often raised in a culture of duty and respect for superiors, these candidates do not seek conflict or place themselves above procedures. They are the type of employee who will ask questions if unsure, arrive early to prepare properly, and will not leave their post until everything is done.

However, it's important to remember that 50+ candidates often doubt themselves. For years, they've heard they're "too old," that "this isn't their field," or that "they won't manage with computers." This leads them to withdraw easily—they often don't even apply, despite being interested, because they assume they "don't stand a chance." Therefore, it's crucial that recruitment communications include signals like "age doesn't matter," "we will train you from scratch," and "your attitude is what counts."

Employers who have opened up to this group often express surprise: "I didn't expect them to be so reliable," "After three weeks, they were better than the younger ones with experience." It's worth remembering that a 50+ candidate without a hospitality resume can become the most stable, trusted link in the team—if only given a chance.

What distinguishes 50+ candidates without experience in hospitality?

Although often lacking formal experience in hospitality, 50+ candidates bring to the team a set of qualities that become crucial in operational work—especially in times of high turnover and intergenerational tensions. They are characterized by a work style based on responsibility, personal culture, and readiness to engage, contrasting with the dynamics of younger generations often focused on quick results and individual development. They bring to the hospitality industry experiences and best practices from previous years and past organizations.

This group of employees' greatest asset is the consistency between declarations and actions. If they say they'll arrive at 6:00 AM—they are punctual. If entrusted with a task—they perform it without complaining or stating "it's not their responsibility." Employers often highlight their loyalty and predictability, saying: "These are people I can count on, even during the challenging moments of the season."

The personal culture of 50+ individuals is often noticeable from the first day of work. They know how to address guests respectfully, do not interrupt, and do not treat clients as "internet buddies." They are also more inclined to maintain order, respect procedures, and uphold discretion. In professions requiring empathy, patience, and composure—such as housekeeping, kitchen assistance, porter, or breakfast service—they excel, often without any prior experience.

Another distinguishing feature is humility and a realistic approach to work. 50+ individuals do not have excessive expectations regarding the position or team. They do not expect special treatment or seek benefits in the first month of work. Instead—they aim to integrate, learn, and fulfill tasks as expected. In a team, they often take on the role of someone who "does their job" without unnecessary emotions and does not generate tensions. This is also a group that does not have high financial expectations. Usually, the work serves as a supplement to their pension or social benefits. Employees aged 50+ do not necessarily expect an employment contract—an assignment contract or B2B arrangement with invoicing is sufficient for them. They offer great flexibility: you pay for specific tasks without the need for vacation time or seasonal downtime.

It's also worth noting that many representatives of this generation have a highly developed sense of observation and the ability to act "quietly"—in a way that doesn't disturb others but supports the process. They can notice shortages, take care of things without reminders, and simultaneously do not compete for attention or need constant affirmation of their value.

Their relationships with younger colleagues may initially be reserved but often quickly evolve into mutual respect and cooperation, provided the team does not treat them condescendingly as "those who don't know." 50+ candidates can become a kind of internal stabilizer for the team—a non-formal example of patience, balance, and "quiet" work without seeking recognition.

Not insignificantly, individuals in this age group are often willing to work unusual hours, including weekends and holidays. They no longer have obligations related to young children or studies, are flexible, and willing to take on supportive roles that require presence when the younger generation prefers time off. For example, in light of the ongoing recruitment challenges in porter or security services, retired uniformed service members prove especially valuable. They are often willing to work night shifts at the reception or take on roles during hours considered "inconvenient" for younger employees.

In summary—a 50+ candidate without experience in hospitality stands out primarily for maturity, reliability, and readiness for loyal cooperation. Their lack of operational experience can be easily compensated for, whereas the personality traits they bring are challenging to develop in many younger candidates. In a well-managed team, they become not only valuable employees but also a source of balance and quality service.

Generations X and Y versus Z in hospitality – differences worth knowing and utilizing Managing personnel in hospitality today involves the cooperation of three generations: X (born around 1965–1980), Y (1981–1995), and Z (1996 and younger). The differences between them are real—not only in professional behaviors but also in values and lifestyle. Instead of viewing them as barriers, it's worth adopting a perspective of complementarity—where one generation brings dynamism, another offers stability. In hospitality—a sector that lives by the rhythm of changes, seasons, and guest needs—generational diversity can become the team's strength.

Generation X: independence, loyalty, consistency

These are individuals aged 45+, often the most experienced members of the permanent staff. Managers describe them as independent, responsible, and predictable. They exhibit a significant ability to manage work independently and rarely require supervision. These are employees who "know what needs to be done"—and they do it.

Their loyalty stems from attachment to the workplace rather than emotions—they are rational and practical, valuing stability. In hospitality, they perform well in positions requiring diligence, good organization, and direct guest contact. They like to know "what to expect," value clear procedures, and expect respect.

However, their weaker side may be less openness to technological changes, requiring patient onboarding and support. But once they master new solutions—they apply them consistently without the need for constant reminders.

Generation Y (Millennials): empathy, need for development, multitasking

These are individuals aged 30–45—often team leaders or experienced specialists today. They understand the value of teamwork and thrive in situations requiring empathy and client interaction. They are characterized by a desire for development, the need for recognition, and a high level of interpersonal communication.

They are effective in environments that offer them the opportunity for influence and flexibility but are less resistant to routine. In hospitality, they excel when they can co-create the atmosphere of the place—functioning well as animators, change leaders, or relationship managers.
Generation Y's advantage is the ability to operate at the intersection of technology and human interaction—they understand systems but do not forget about the human element. They are open to working with older individuals, provided the team operates on principles of mutual respect and transparency.

Generation Z: energy, speed, need for immediacy

The youngest generation in the labor market—individuals aged 18–30—are currently the most numerous groups among seasonal hotel workers. Their strengths include technological proficiency, flexibility, and the ability to learn quickly. They are not afraid of changes and easily adapt to new systems and tasks.

From employers' perspective, their biggest challenge is low loyalty, the need for quick results, and limited long-term engagement. They often choose a workplace not based on mission or team but on schedule, salary, and "here and now" potential.

Generation Z prefers environments with partner communication, flexibility, clear boundaries, and quick feedback. They function well when surrounded by older colleagues who do not judge but help them integrate.

How does this work in a team?

Generational differences can be a source of tension but, with proper management, become the foundation of a strong, self-regulating team. A 50+ employee can be an informal mentor—someone who demonstrates calmness and diligence in stressful situations. A younger colleague, in turn, can assist with system operations, explain shortcuts, and teach platform usage. Such an exchange of competencies works best when based on trust and the absence of superiority.

A well-managed multigenerational team is not a set of compromises—it's a mosaic of talents and approaches that complement each other. The manager's task is not to "smooth out differences" but to honestly name and utilize them for a common goal.

Potential benefits for employers of hiring a 50+ employee

Hiring individuals aged 50 and above without prior experience in hospitality might initially seem risky—especially in a fast-paced, ever-changing, and technically demanding industry. However, upon closer examination, it becomes evident that this is one of the most undervalued staffing investments, offering numerous tangible benefits to hotel operations. Some potential advantages of employing 50+ representatives include:

Employment stability. In an environment where employee turnover is a significant issue, individuals aged 50+ stand out for their consistency and predictability. They don't change jobs impulsively, don't apply "just to try," and aren't constantly seeking "better opportunities." For many, employment is not just a source of income but also a sign of trust and self-worth, translating into strong motivation to maintain their job.

High responsibility and work ethic. Employing someone aged 50+ provides an employer with an individual who doesn't require daily supervision. These employees operate on the principle that "if something needs to be done—it should be done." They don't procrastinate, don't delay tasks, and don't look for excuses. This is the epitome of reliability. In daily operational management, this means less stress for the managerial staff and greater assurance that essential processes will be executed well and on time.

Calmness and resilience in difficult situations. Life experience among individuals aged 50+ translates into greater emotional stability. They can handle stressful situations with guests without escalation, are not easily thrown off balance, and act less impulsively. Their presence in the team stabilizes dynamics, especially during peak seasons when time pressure and guest numbers are highest. Often, younger employees turn to them for advice or support—even informally.

Fewer absences. Individuals over fifty are less likely to take leave for trivial reasons. For various reasons—they've raised children, aren't studying, have a different approach to responsibility—they are more present and predictable in the schedule. This is crucial for team stability and operational fluidity, especially in departments like housekeeping, gastronomy, or breakfast service.

Willingness to work during challenging hours. Unlike many younger candidates, individuals aged 50+ don't avoid working on weekends, holidays, or nights—provided they know what's expected of them. They are available, can plan ahead, and adapt to schedules without excessive expectations. In hospitality, where staff availability during non-standard hours is often critical, this is a significant asset.

Enhancing the hotel's social image. Employing individuals aged 50+ strengthens the hotel's image as an open, responsible, and socially modern employer. In an era of increasing sensitivity to inclusivity and diversity, guests increasingly notice and appreciate companies that invest in people "outside the mainstream recruitment pool." Such an employee is not just an operational asset but also a reputational one.

Potential as long-term employees. Unlike seasonal workers or young people starting their careers, individuals aged 50+ often seek a "final career stage"—a place they can commit to long-term. Although they may require more support initially, they later become loyal, grateful, and show no desire to change. They should be viewed as an investment that pays off not immediately but through lasting value and low risk of departure.

Hiring someone aged 50+ without hospitality experience is not just a gesture of openness—it's a strategic decision that can strengthen the team, improve service quality, and bring real operational savings. It only takes a bit of trust at the beginning—and then just let them do what they do best: work diligently, honestly, and with full commitment.

Potential challenges — and how to address them

While hiring a 50+ employee without hospitality experience brings numerous benefits, it's essential to acknowledge that this process can also present certain challenges—both organizational and social. What may initially seem like a "problem" often turns out to be a matter of proper onboarding and appropriate communication style. Among potential challenges, it's worth considering:

Challenge 1: longer onboarding and training process. Individuals aged 50+ may need more time to master procedures, understand internal systems, or learn to use hotel applications. For managers accustomed to quick, seasonal onboarding, this might be frustrating—"young people pick up faster." And that's true. But an older employee, though slower in the initial phase, usually integrates more permanently and doesn't require constant reminders, as is often the case with younger colleagues. The solution is patience combined with a clear training structure—step by step, without haste, and with the assurance that questions are welcome. It's beneficial to assign their onboarding not only to a supervisor but also to an experienced team member who communicates well and can explain calmly, without a sense of superiority.

Challenge 2: technological barriers. It's no secret that some 50+ candidates have limited experience with computer systems, terminals, or hotel applications. Their digital competencies are often "spotty"—they can send emails, use basic Excel functions, but are unfamiliar with internal CRM systems, planning tools, or POS systems. This doesn't mean they can't learn—they just need more time and training based on examples and practical exercises, not theoretical instructions. A good practice is to develop "cheat sheets"—printed materials with step-by-step instructions—that they can take home and practice at their own pace.

Challenge 3: team's concerns about "differences". In some teams, there's resistance—sometimes silent, sometimes expressed jokingly—toward the presence of an older person "without experience, who will ask about everything." Such attitudes are understandable but need to be actively addressed from the onboarding announcement stage. The manager's role is to explain to the team why such a person is joining, what they need at the start, and what they can contribute to the team. An excellent solution is pairing the 50+ individual with a younger employee—not as a form of control but collaboration. This relationship can benefit both parties: the older learns the practice, the younger—communication and patience.

Challenge 4: physical and health concerns. Some roles in hospitality require physical fitness, long hours on one's feet, lifting, carrying—and here arises the question: can a 50+ person handle it? The key is to match the position to their capabilities. Where precision and repeatability matter more than speed and strength—individuals aged 50+ perform excellently. If an employer expects physical work at the pace of a student from a temp agency—it might not be the best fit. However, it's worth remembering that physical fitness isn't just about age—some fifty-year-olds have more energy and health than twenty-year-olds who spend their days in front of screens. The assessment should focus on the individual, not their age.
Instead of viewing these challenges as obstacles, it's better to see them as tasks to plan for. A 50+ employee doesn't need special treatment but a fair start: clear rules, patient onboarding, and a sense that they don't have to pretend to be someone they're not. In return, they offer the company calmness, reliability, and surprisingly high enthusiasm—precisely because someone believed in them.

Preparing managers for collaboration: building an environment conducive to integration

Integrating an individual aged 50+ without prior hospitality experience into a team requires a manager's conscious approach that considers both the new employee's needs and the existing team's dynamics. Key aspects include:

1. Conscious leadership and empathy: Managers should demonstrate empathy and understanding, recognizing that starting a new career in a different industry can be challenging for someone over 50. Creating an atmosphere where the new employee feels accepted and supported is crucial.
2. Clear communication of expectations: Clearly outlining the role, responsibilities, and work standards helps the new employee understand what is expected, boosting their confidence and effectiveness.
3. Providing appropriate training: Individuals over 50 may need more time to assimilate new information, especially regarding technology. Therefore, it's important to offer training tailored to their needs and learning pace.
4. Promoting a culture of diversity: Managers should actively foster a culture of diversity and inclusion within the team, emphasizing the value each employee brings, regardless of age or experience.

Preparing colleagues for collaboration: building a team based on mutual respect

Colleagues play a vital role in integrating a new employee aged 50+ without hospitality experience. Considerations include:

1. Openness and patience: The new employee may require more time to learn procedures and understand job specifics. Colleagues should be patient and willing to offer support.
2. Sharing knowledge: Experienced employees can act as mentors, sharing their knowledge and experience, which not only supports the new employee but also strengthens team bonds.
3. Mutual respect: Respecting diverse experiences and perspectives is key to building a cohesive team. Colleagues should avoid stereotypes and prejudices, focusing on shared goals and values.
4. Shared goals and cooperation: Emphasizing common objectives and the importance of collaboration aids in integrating the new employee and building a strong, united team.

Integrating an employee aged 50+ without hospitality experience is a process that requires commitment from both managers and colleagues. Through conscious leadership, empathy, openness, and mutual respect, it's possible to create a work environment where every employee feels valued and motivated to achieve common goals.

How to encourage individuals aged 50+ without experience to apply in hospitality

Encouraging individuals over fifty to embark on a new career—especially in a dynamic industry like hospitality—requires a delicate yet effective approach. It's not about persuasion or making empty promises. The key is addressing the needs, fears, and motivations of this age group, which, though often overlooked in recruitment, can become a solid team foundation. Consider the following:

- Recognition and respect: One main reason individual aged 50+ hesitate to apply for new positions is the fear of rejection and age-based judgment. Recruitment communication should clearly emphasize that life experience and maturity are welcomed, not seen as obstacles. Using language that builds trust—highlighting stability, understanding, honesty, and reliability—resonates with this age group.

- Highlighting the value of hospitality work: Individuals aged 50+ aren't seeking rapid career advancement but rather meaning, stability, and a positive atmosphere. Hospitality can offer this—provided it's presented appropriately. Communication should highlight aspects like human interaction, the opportunity to be part of hospitality (not necessarily in front-line roles), schedule regularity and predictability (especially in roles like kitchen assistant, housekeeping, breakfast service), a sense of purpose, visible work outcomes, team interaction, real responsibility, and proximity to work, reducing commuting time, which gains importance with age.

- Alleviating fear of the unknown: Many potential candidates aged 50+ refrain from applying because they are unsure of what to expect. They fear they won't manage technology, procedures, or team dynamics. Therefore, messaging should include information about a calm onboarding process, available training, and the opportunity to ask questions without judgment. Phrases like "No experience needed— we'll teach you everything" are more effective than any slogan.
- Sharing stories of people like them: Authentic examples of individuals aged 50+ who have found their place in hospitality are powerful. Promotional materials should showcase specific stories— like "Maria, 56, started as a kitchen assistant and now works full-time in the breakfast department." Such messages break stereotypes and demonstrate that it's not just theoretically possible but achievable.

- Explicitly stating advantages: Mature individuals often doubt they have anything to offer. Therefore, job postings and recruitment efforts should explicitly state: "We're looking for precise, reliable individuals who are punctual and enjoy calm, organized work." Such statements hit the mark and create a sense that someone is genuinely seeking them, not just a young, flexible candidate for any role.

Encouraging individuals aged 50+ to apply in hospitality isn't about "paying homage to age." It's about restoring balance in the job market, which has long favored mobility over stability and speed over accuracy. Well-designed communication, an open recruitment approach, and conscious barrier-breaking are not just ways to fill vacancies—they're investments in team quality and the long-term development of the hotel.

Deaf employees. Unlocking potential: silent skills, loud impact

Why hire Deaf employees now?

Because workforce shortages in hospitality are becoming critical. Unemployment rate rising during and after the COVID-19 pandemic is a serious challenge to many people globally. The traditional talent pool has shrunk post-pandemic, and competition for loyal, detail-oriented staff is growing. Deaf are an unlocked potential in the workforce.
Yet across Europe, many Deaf individuals remain underemployed or excluded from service-sector roles, compared to the general population, due to preventable barriers — mostly related to awareness and communication.

This untapped talent pool offers hotels a strategic advantage. Deaf employees often demonstrate excellent visual attention, calmness under pressure, and a strong sense of teamwork — exactly the qualities that build consistency in guest services and back-of-house operations.

This guide invites employers to see inclusion not as a charity gesture, but as a smart operational decision. With just a few adjustments, most hospitality workplaces can accommodate Deaf team members with minimal cost and high long-term return. These adjustments benefit all staff, improve retention, and modernize the work culture.

By reading this guide, you're not only gaining a roadmap to inclusive hiring — you're also joining a growing movement in European hospitality: one that values diversity as a strength, and difference as a driver of quality service.

Who is a Deaf candidate in hospitality?

A Deaf candidate in the hospitality industry is a job seeker or employee whose primary mode of communication may not be spoken language. This includes people who identify as culturally Deaf and use sign language (such as Greek Sign Language), as well as those who are hard of hearing and may use speech, lip-reading, or hearing aids. The Deaf community is diverse, with different preferences, educational backgrounds, and cultural affiliations. What unites Deaf individuals in the employment context is not the inability to hear, but the need for inclusive communication and equitable access to opportunities.

In many parts of Europe, Deaf people face a dual barrier in the workforce: lack of awareness among employers, and physical or procedural inaccessibility. Despite these challenges, Deaf individuals regularly demonstrate adaptability, visual strength, concentration, and precision — traits that make them highly effective in structured, task-oriented environments such as hospitality.

It's important to move beyond stereotypes. A Deaf person is not inherently 'limited' in their ability to interact with guests or team members. What they need is access — access to visual information, access to a workplace culture that values diversity, and access to tools (like visual alerts or captioning software) that enable full participation. When these conditions are met, Deaf employees thrive.

Many Deaf job seekers are trained professionals or vocational graduates who are eager to work but face exclusion due to communication assumptions. They often bring a high level of discipline and commitment to the job, precisely because work opportunities have been historically scarce or conditional. In hospitality roles like housekeeping, kitchen prep, front desk support (with adapted systems), porter service, and guest logistics, Deaf employees excel — often outperforming hearing colleagues in visual monitoring, routine adherence, and calmness under pressure.

Deaf candidates may also benefit from community-based training programs. In the UK, Greece, and Sweden, organizations provide job-readiness courses, vocational training, and placement support. Candidates who come through these pipelines are typically well-prepared for work and committed to building a long-term career.

Managers should understand that interviewing a Deaf person might require slight adjustments — such as writing questions, using Sign Language interpreters, or providing video captions. But the goal remains the same: to assess core skills, motivation, and alignment with the team. Once hired, the candidate's Deafness is not a liability — it becomes a dimension of team strength, especially in guest-facing settings where diverse staff can better serve diverse clientele.

Ultimately, a Deaf candidate in hospitality is someone who wants what every employee wants: respect, opportunity, and the chance to contribute meaningfully. What distinguishes them is not a deficit in hearing, but a surplus in perseverance, attention to detail, and often — untapped potential. Recognizing this is the first step toward inclusion that works.

What distinguishes Deaf candidates in hospitality?

Deaf candidates bring a distinctive set of competencies, experiences, and perspectives that enrich hospitality teams far beyond expectations. Their capacity for visual learning, their attention to non-verbal cues, and their resilience in navigating auditory-centric environments have forged work ethics grounded in adaptability and self-sufficiency. Rather than focusing on what Deaf candidates lack, employers benefit more by identifying the unique contributions they offer — contributions which can directly enhance service quality, team dynamics, and operational consistency.

Research has consistently shown that Deaf individuals demonstrate high levels of attention to detail, punctuality, and reliability — traits that align perfectly with the fast-paced, routine-driven demands of hospitality work. In roles such as room cleaning, banquet setups, food preparation, and guest logistics, precision and consistency are valued more than verbal interaction. Deaf staffs often excel in these environments, particularly when equipped with accessible workflows and visual task aids.

A study found that while hearing managers were often unfamiliar with Deaf workers' specific accommodation needs, they viewed them as highly dependable and professional. Deaf employees themselves reported feeling respected by supervisors but expressed ongoing challenges in areas such as communication during meetings and inconsistent access to interpreters or captioning tools. This signals a gap not in potential, but in workplace systems that support full participation.

Other recent studies reinforce these findings, showing that Deaf workers often experience elevated stress due to barriers in communication, limited peer support, and lack of systemic understanding. Yet they continue to persevere, demonstrating strong self-efficacy, visual cognition, and independent problem-solving — especially in structured or repetitive tasks where routine mastery is an asset.

It's also important to recognize the broader skill sets Deaf candidates contribute. Deaf workers tend to be creative problem solvers and effective visual thinkers. They often notice visual patterns and safety cues that others miss. Their spatial awareness can optimize how kitchen stations, guest floors, or inventory systems are organized. In design, housekeeping, event staging, and audiovisual roles, this perspective is especially valuable.

Deaf professionals bring cultural awareness too — particularly when serving Deaf guests. They understand accessibility needs from lived experience and can ensure that services like visual alarms, captioned media, or simplified signage are applied correctly. This insider knowledge becomes a form of inclusive quality control, improving guest satisfaction and aligning the business with international standards like the UN CRPD.

Finally, the mere presence of Deaf team members can positively influence workplace culture. Their ability to navigate adversity often inspires others, builds empathy in teams, and breaks down unconscious biases. Many teams report that working with Deaf colleagues leads to clearer communication habits, more thoughtful task delegation, and stronger visual communication practices across the board.

In summary, Deaf candidates do not merely adapt to the hospitality industry — they elevate it. By recognizing their core strengths and removing barriers to access, employers unlock a resource of dedication, insight, and talent that distinguishes them in any setting.

Differences worth knowing: Deaf vs. hard of hearing employees

While both Deaf employees fall under the broader umbrella of DHH (Deaf and Hard of Hearing), there are important differences in their communication preferences, identities, and workplace needs. Recognizing these distinctions helps managers provide more effective accommodations and foster an inclusive, respectful environment.

1. Language & communication style
   Deaf employees primarily use sign language, while many hard-of-hearing individuals also sign but may rely on residual hearing, spoken language, hearing aids, or cochlear implants.
   - Tip: Always ask about preferred communication methods. Never assume spoken language is the default.

2. Cultural identity
   Deaf employees may identify with the Deaf community and Deaf culture. This identity includes shared language, values, history, and norms distinct from the hearing world.
   - Tip: Understand that Deafness is not always seen as a disability but as a cultural identity, especially among native signers.

3. Accommodations
Deaf workers may require sign language interpreters, video relay services, or captioned training materials. Hard of hearing workers may prefer assistive listening devices, amplified phones, visual alarms, or written communication.
- Tip: Accommodations must be individualized — even two employees with similar audiograms may have different needs.

4. Perception of sound
Deaf individuals primarily use visual communication but may have some residual hearing in certain frequencies.
- Tip: Environments with loud machines or echo can be especially challenging for Deaf staff. Minimize noise or offer quiet alternatives.

5. Technology use
Deaf employees may use smartphones or tablets for real-time captioning, visual alerts, or sign language communication apps or speech-to-text apps.
- Tip: Equip shared areas with multiple communication supports — visual, written, and auditory.

Business and team benefits

Hiring Deaf employees in hospitality beyond of act of inclusion mentality, it's a smart business decision. Across Europe and beyond, hotels that integrate Deaf people report improvements in team cohesion, guest satisfaction, employee retention, and brand reputation. As staff shortages and high turnover continue to challenge the industry, Deaf workers offer a largely untapped solution grounded in loyalty, reliability, and unique service strengths.
Deaf employees contribute tangible value in many hospitality roles — particularly where task consistency, safety awareness, and visual precision are paramount. In housekeeping, kitchen prep, inventory management, porter service, and even front-desk support (with adaptations), they routinely outperform expectations. In a study of inclusive hotels in India and South Africa, managers noted significantly lower absenteeism and higher productivity among Deaf workers compared to their hearing colleagues.

Visual vigilance is another asset. Deaf workers are trained by necessity to pick up subtle environmental cues and can quickly identify issues like spills, misplaced items, or safety hazards. This makes them particularly valuable in high-traffic areas where guest safety and cleanliness are critical.

From a team perspective, the presence of Deaf colleagues often improves group communication habits. Teams become more visually oriented, reduce unnecessary noise, and rely more on clear instructions and shared tools — practices that benefit all employees. Cultural empathy also improves, particularly when teams learn basic sign language or work closely with interpreters.

Guest experience is also enhanced. Deaf guests, who are often underserved, feel represented and valued when hotels have Deaf employees. These staff understand how to provide clear visual communication, accommodate guest needs with respect, and avoid awkward assumptions.

In one case study, a UK hotel saw a 22% increase in return visits from Deaf travelers after implementing visual signage and hiring Deaf concierge staff.

Perhaps most strategically, hiring Deaf workers strengthens brand image. In an era where consumers value social responsibility, inclusive hiring sends a powerful message. Hotels that employ Deaf individuals demonstrate leadership in diversity, often earning recognition in tourism awards, corporate social responsibility rankings, and community partnerships.

In summary, the business case for Deaf hiring in hospitality is strong. It improves retention, guest satisfaction, team cohesion, and brand credibility — while also opening the doors to an underutilized, motivated, and highly capable people.

Barriers & real-world challenges

Despite clear benefits, Deaf individuals continue to face substantial challenges in the hospitality workforce. These barriers are often not due to an individual's capabilities but to structural limitations in how the workplace is designed, managed, and communicated. Addressing these real-world challenges is critical to creating sustainable, inclusive employment.

One of the most persistent barriers is communication in team settings. In meetings, huddles, or fast-paced back-of-house environments, Deaf employees are frequently excluded from spontaneous discussions or informal instructions.

Deaf workers report high stress and fatigue levels when they must navigate inconsistent or insufficient communication structures. Similarly the recent studies highlight that accommodation satisfaction is often low, particularly around communication access in meetings and emergency alerts.

Many Deaf employees encounter colleagues or supervisors who, though respectful, are unsure how to interact or support them. While most Deaf employees report feeling socially accepted, they still experience the burden of needing to self-advocate. They may have to repeatedly request inter-preters, written instructions, or visual adaptations — efforts that can be draining over time. Some experts emphasize that even highly motivated Deaf workers hesitate to request accommodations due to fear of stigma or being viewed as "difficult."

Workplace policies and systems often fail to include Deaf employees by design. For example, emergency protocols relying solely on sound-based alarms put Deaf workers at risk. Training materials without captions, induc-tion programs without interpreters, or scheduling apps that don't support visual alerts create daily friction.

Another problem is that there are not many Deaf role models or mentors. Many times, a Deaf employee is the only Deaf person on the team. This can make them feel lonely or left out. Also, there are not enough training programs to help Deaf employees become leaders. So, very few Deaf people get jobs as supervisors or managers. This makes it seem like Deaf people cannot be leaders, a true misunderstanding. But when there are no Deaf leaders, people may believe this false idea even more.

In summary, while the intentions of most employers are positive, the systems and cultures in place often lag behind. Overcoming these barriers requires intentional design, consistent inclusion strategies, and empowering Deaf employees to co-create solutions that work. Barriers can be removed with thoughtful design.

How integrate a Deaf employee in a team?

Hiring a Deaf employee is the beginning of building a team culture where everyone can progress. When done thoughtfully, the presence of a Deaf team member often improves how teams communicate, collaborate, and care for each other and guests.

A Deaf employee can succeed in any department — housekeeping, kitchen prep, front office, concierge, maintenance — when the team makes a few essential adjustments:

Communication becomes more intentional

Teams with Deaf members learn to communicate more clearly and visually. Instead of shouting across rooms or relying on verbal orders, team members:

- Make eye contact before speaking
- Use hand signals or gestures for routine tasks
- Rely on written instructions, whiteboards, or shared task apps
- Slow down to ensure everyone is aligned

These habits reduce miscommunication and improve efficiency — for everyone.

Diversity strengthens collaboration

A Deaf employee brings a unique lived experience that expands the team's cultural competence. Colleagues often become more aware of different ways of experiencing the world and more thoughtful in their interactions. This shift encourages:

- Patience and empathy
- Team work and cohesion
- Shared problem-solving in new ways

Performance is collaborative

In practice, Deaf employees often become visual anchors in their teams, people who spot details others miss or keep routines consistent. In kitchens, they may excel at plating and prep; in housekeeping, they often track standards precisely. Their reliability improves group output.

Teams naturally adjust workflows:
- A front desk agent might loop in a Deaf colleague for check-ins using a tablet app
- A kitchen supervisor might post visual shift briefings on a wall
- A porter might develop hand signals with a Deaf teammate to coordinate guest baggage service

The takeaway

With openness, a bit of training, and the right tools, hospitality teams not only include Deaf staff, they learn from them and grow stronger together. Hiring Deaf employees in hospitality is an advantage. Businesses that embrace Deaf talent often report improved performance, stronger team dynamics, and enhanced brand reputation.

Recruitment best practices

Recruiting and onboarding Deaf employees effectively requires more than posting an open job — it demands intentional outreach, inclusive practices, and accessible processes from the very first interaction. The steps outlined below help ensure that Deaf candidates feel respected, understood, and positioned for success from day one.

Use clear language in job descriptions. Provide a Sign Language video and an accessibility statement. List available accommodations for applicants.

Contact with Deaf community organizations, vocational training centers, and disability employment services to advertise open roles. Attend inclusive job fairs or collaborate with schools that support Deaf graduates.

Offer accessible interviews: options such as Sign Language interpretation, video relay interviews, or written responses for application questions. Ensure that the interview setting is well-lit, face-to-face, and free from background noise.

Evaluate candidates on the essential functions of the role, not on verbal fluency. Focus on task performance, teamwork, and reliability — skills that Deaf candidates often demonstrate strongly.

An inclusive recruitment and onboarding process not only help retain Deaf employees but also signals to all staff and guests that the organization values equity and accessibility from the ground up.

Benefits from the point of view of hoteliers

The business case for inclusive hiring

Industry-specific challenges
The hospitality industry worldwide faces ongoing challenges with high turnover rates and workforce shortages, as documented by multiple industry analyses (Caterer. com, 2020). Traditional recruitment pools often prove inadequate in meeting persistent staffing demands, especially in seasonal areas and during economic downturns. Hotels need employees who can reliably perform in customer-facing roles that require strong soft skills and consistent qualities that are becoming increasingly hard to find in conventional labor markets.

Untapped talent resources

Workers over 50 and Deaf individuals represent significantly underutilized talent pools with the potential to address these industry challenges. According to the European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions (2019), these demographics offer unique advantages when properly integrated into hospitality settings. The availability of governmental and non-governmental support systems has reduced implementation barriers for hoteliers, creating opportunities to tap into these resources with minimal financial risk.

Key benefits for hoteliers

Fighting workforce shortages

The integration of older and deaf workers directly addresses chronic staffing challenges by expanding the candidate pool beyond traditional demographics. Research published by Austrade (2019) indicates lower turnover rates among older workers, which significantly reduces recruitment and training costs, a particular concern in hospitality, where staff replacement costs can reach 30-50% of annual salary. Enhanced workforce stability improves operational continuity, a critical factor in maintaining service standards.

Superior customer experience

Hilton UK's pilot program with Deaf front desk staff utilizing visual communication tools resulted in an 18% increase in customer satisfaction scores (Hilton CSR Report, 2019). This improvement reflects how diverse teams better relate to an increasingly diverse customer base. Multiple hotel managers report that older workers demonstrate enhanced patience and service orientation with guests, particularly during high-stress situations or when handling complaints.

Valuable work attributes

Employees aged 50+ typically bring reliability, punctuality, and emotional maturity that benefit hotel operations. According to research from the European Social Fund Plus (2021), these workers show significantly lower absenteeism compared to younger employees. Similarly, Deaf employees, when provided with appropriate arrangements, shine in tasks requiring visual attention and focus. Deaf workers often demonstrate exceptional concentration in detail-oriented tasks, which translates to higher quality control, especially in roles like housekeeping and food preparation.

Brand enhancement and loyalty

Inclusive hiring practices create measurable improvements in brand perception. Modern travelers increasingly consider corporate social responsibility when making booking decisions. The integration of visible diversity initiatives improves brand perception and customer loyalty, particularly among Millennial and Generation Z travelers. Certification programs such as "Inclusive Hotel" designations create marketing advantages similar to established eco-certification programs, opening access to socially conscious market segments.

Financial advantages

Training grants and accessibility funding minimize onboarding expenses, while reduced turnover translates to significant cost savings over time. The European Social Fund Plus documentation (2021) indicates that participating businesses typically recover any adaptation investments within the first year through combined savings and subsidies.

Case studies:
successful implementation models

Marriott's deaf inclusion initiative (United States)

Marriott Hotels implemented a comprehensive Deaf inclusion program that focuses on visual alert systems and specialized training. The initiative primarily placed Deaf employees in housekeeping, kitchen staff, and maintenance positions while paying careful attention to communication protocols. According to Marriott's People with Disabilities Associate Resource Group (ARG) documentation, participating locations reported enhanced task focus and quality control from Deaf team members. The program's success led to its expansion across multiple properties, with adaptation costs offset by tax incentives and improved operational metrics.

Hilton UK's front desk integration

Hilton UK developed innovative visual tools and communication systems for Deaf staff at Front office desks. The program measured an 18% increase in customer satisfaction scores, with guests specifically commenting on the thoroughness and attention to detail in their interactions. Integration costs were offset by government support programs through the UK's Disability Confident scheme, while improved retention rates further enhanced financial outcomes. The program has since become a model for other Hilton properties across Europe.

Cyprus hotel association age-inclusive program

The Cyprus Hotel Association created a partnership utilizing European Social Fund ESF+ Aid Scheme subsidies, specifically targeting workers over 50. This initiative strategically placed older workers in reception, guest relations, and administrative roles that benefit from life experience and interpersonal skills. The program's structure included a 10-month subsidy period allowing hotels to train and integrate staff with minimal financial risk. Between 2016 and 2020, 1,155 individuals benefited from the program, with participating hotels reporting high satisfaction with both performance and retention (European Social Fund Plus, 2021).

Polish boutique hotels PFRON partnership

Smaller independent hotels in Poland accessed wage subsidies and workplace adaptation funding through the PFRON (State Fund for Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons) program. These boutique properties found that Deaf employees excelled particularly in housekeeping and food preparation roles, where attention to detail created measurable quality improvements. Participating hotels reported that accessing these resources created a competitive advantage through specialized labor pools. Industry associations have subsequently developed streamlined application processes to expand participation.

Greek island resorts accessibility initiative

Seasonal resorts across Greek islands implemented inclusion programs utilizing grants from the public employment authority (DYPA), which cover 90% of workplace modification costs up to €2,500. These properties integrated visual communication systems that benefited both staff and international guests, creating unexpected synergies. Several properties developed specialized guest experience roles leveraging the life experience of workers over 50, particularly in creating authentic cultural experiences for visitors. Under Greece's Recovery and Resilience Plan, additional funding has supported interpreter training and digital accessibility tools that enhance both employment and guest experiences.

Hotel job positions and integration strategies

Well-suited roles for 50+ workers

Front office and guest relations positions represent ideal placements for older workers, leveraging their life experience and interpersonal skills. Hotels report that guests respond positively to mature staff members who demonstrate patience and local knowledge. Administrative and back-office roles utilize organizational abilities and attention to detail that often come with experience. Many properties have created training and mentoring positions specifically for older workers, benefiting from their accumulated knowledge and patience with newer staff members. According to Caterer.com (2020), over 165,000 workers over 50 joined the UK hospitality sector in three years, predominantly in these role categories.

Successful positions for deaf employees

Housekeeping departments have proven particularly successful for Deaf integration, as these roles involve minimal verbal communication needs while benefiting from enhanced visual attention. Kitchen and food preparation positions leverage focus and precision in structured environments, with many hotels reporting quality improvements after integration. Some properties have successfully placed Deaf employees at front desks by implementing visual communication systems that ultimately benefit all guests, particularly international travelers. Visual alerts for room readiness, emergencies, and service requests create more efficient operations overall.

Key implementation strategies

Successful hoteliers' partner with specialized NGOs for recruitment and ongoing support, reducing internal resource requirements. Investment in basic visual communication tools and training creates property-wide benefits beyond the immediate needs. Forward-thinking properties leverage available government subsidies and grants to offset implementation costs, often achieving a net positive financial impact within the first year. Many hotels create mentorship pairs to facilitate knowledge transfer between experienced and newer staff members. The development of clear visual protocols for emergencies represents an essential safety component that benefits all staff and guests, regardless of their hearing status.

Financial incentives

European Union framework

The European Social Fund Plus (ESF+) provides substantial funding targeting inclusive employment across member states, with specific allocations for hospitality sector initiatives. These programs aim to reduce inequality while addressing labor market shortages. Recovery and Resilience Plans developed following the COVID-19 pandemic include specific hospitality sector support mechanisms focused on workforce diversity and inclusion, creating time-limited opportunities for subsidized implementation.
Country-specific programs

The consortium countries present significant economic incentives for hoteliers who implement inclusive employment practices. A cost-benefit analysis indicates that these financial advantages can substantially increase motivation for adopting such practices while simultaneously addressing concerns regarding initial capital expenditure for integrating new labor demographics

Poland's PFRON program provides comprehensive support, including wage subsidies, social security reimbursements, and adaptation funding for employers who hire individuals with disabilities. Companies with 25 or more employees must meet a mandatory 6% quota for including disabled staff, although enforcement can vary.

Greece combines legislation with practical support through the D.YP.A Grant covering 90% of accommodation costs up to €2,500 per implementation. Since 2002, Greek national building codes have required hotels to include accessible rooms and common areas, creating infrastructure that supports workforce inclusion.

Cyprus focuses on age inclusion through its targeted 10-month wage subsidy for hiring workers over 50, followed by a 2-month retention requirement. This program has demonstrated proven effectiveness with 1,155 successful placements between 2016–2020.

The data contradicts the common perception that inclusive employment requires prohibitively high investment. When analyzed over a 3–5-year period, the financial returns typically exceed implementation costs by a significant margin.
Conclusion:
The forward-looking approach

Integrating 50+ and Deaf employees into hotel operations represents not simply a social good but a strategic business advantage. The combination of workforce stability, enhanced customer experience, and financial incentives creates a compelling case for hoteliers. Those who have implemented such programs report significant benefits that outweigh the initial adaptation investments. As labor markets continue to tighten and consumer preferences change toward socially responsible businesses, hotels embracing inclusive hiring gain competitive advantages while addressing persistent industry challenges.
